Race Plays Role in Kids' Food Allergies: Study

Black American children have higher rates of shellfish and fish allergies than white children, a new study finds.

The research confirms the important role that race plays in children's food allergies, the study authors said.

"Food allergy is a common condition in the U.S., and we know from our previous research that there are important differences between African American and white children with food allergy, but there is so much we need to know to be able to help our patients from minority groups," said study co-author Dr. Mahboobeh Mahdavinia. She is chief of allergy and immunology at Rush University Medical Center in Chicago.

"In this current paper, our goal was to understand whether children from different races are allergic to similar foods, or if there is a difference based on their racial background," Mahdavinia said in a medical center news release.

The research team studied 664 children, aged 12 and under, who'd been diagnosed with a food allergy. Of those, 36% were Black and 64% were white.

Compared to white kids, Black children were more likely to have shellfish and fin fish allergy, and to have a wheat allergy, the investigators found.

Cockroach exposure can trigger shellfish and fin fish allergy in children, and there are higher levels of cockroach allergens in poorer inner-city neighborhoods where many Black children live, the study authors noted.

The findings support the importance of reducing Black children's exposure to cockroaches, the researchers said.

According to study co-author Susan Fox, an allergy and immunology physician assistant at Rush, "This information can help us care for not only a child's food allergy, but all of their allergic diseases, including asthma, allergic rhinitis [hay fever] and atopic dermatitis [eczema]."

The study also found that Black children with food allergies were more likely to have asthma than white children with food allergies, and that children with a shellfish allergy were more likely to have more severe asthma.

Asthma accompanies about 70% of deaths from severe allergic reactions [anaphylaxis] to food, the study authors said.

"African American children are at a two- to threefold risk of fatal anaphylaxis compared to white children," Mahdavinia said. "By knowing this information, it can identify most at-risk patients."

The report was published in the February issue of the Journal of Allergy and Clinical Immunology: In Practice.

Enlarged spaces in the brain that fill with fluid around small blood vessels may be a harbinger of impending dementia, a new Australian study suggests.

Typically, these so-called perivascular spaces help clear waste and toxins from the brain and might be linked with changes in the aging brain, researchers say.

“Dilated perivascular spaces, which are a common MRI finding, especially in the elderly, are not just an incidental finding,” said study author Dr. Matt Paradise, a psychiatrist and research fellow at the Centre for Healthy Brain Ageing at the University of New South Wales in Sydney. “Instead, they should be taken seriously, and assessing their severity may be able to help clinicians and researchers better diagnose dementia and help predict the trajectory of people with cognitive decline.”

Paradise noted, however, that the study does not prove that enlarged perivascular spaces cause thinking and memory problems, only that there is an association.

“Dilated perivascular spaces may be a marker of the disease process, but not necessarily drive it,” he explained. “The underlying mechanisms for dilated perivascular spaces are complex and need unraveling.”

One neurologist agreed that relationship between these enlarged spaces and dementia is complicated.

“We all have perivascular spaces. They are natural, but they’re usually very small, so small that when we do pictures of the brain, we don’t usually see them,” explained Dr. Glen Finney, a neurologist at the Geisinger Specialty Clinic in Wilkes Barre, Pa. “Some people have a few enlarged ones that are probably just normal.”

“But when we see a large amount of these extra spaces developing, that is when we start to suspect there’s probably something more going on in terms of brain health,” added Finney, who is also a Fellow of the American Academy of Neurology. “This is not something that happens to everybody.”

These spaces can enlarge when brain matter is lost or there is a build-up of materials that are normally cleared in those spaces, he explained.

“What we know is that we can see them more with age,” he said. “In some cases, we can see them associated with vascular damage in the brain.”

Finney doesn’t think that these enlarged spaces will be a diagnostic tool, and instead, “It’s really going to be a marker of risk. It’s not going to tell you if you have dementia, it’s not going to tell you if you’re going to get it. It’s just going to tell you that you may be at a little higher risk.”

Looking for connections

For the study, the researchers tested more than 400 people, average age 80. Participants were given tests of thinking and memory skills and assessed for dementia at the beginning of the study and every two years for eight years.

Also, the participants had MRI brain scans to look for enlarged perivascular spaces in two key areas of the brain at the start of the study and every two years for eight years.

The researchers compared the top 25% of those who had the largest number of enlarged perivascular spaces with those with fewer or no enlarged spaces.

They found that those with the most enlarged perivascular spaces were nearly three times more likely to develop dementia than those with fewer or no enlarged spaces.

In all, 24%, or 97 participants, developed dementia during the study. Of the 31 people with enlarged perivascular spaces in both areas of the brain that the researchers looked at, 39% developed dementia.

The people with severe enlargement of perivascular spaces in both areas of the brain were also more likely to have greater decline four years later on their overall scores of cognition than people with mild or no enlargement of spaces.

The results remain unchanged after the researchers took into account other factors that could affect scores on tests or the development of dementia, such as age, high blood pressure and diabetes.

They also accounted for other signs of disease in the small blood vessels in the brain, which can also be a risk of dementia.

The picture is actually more complex, Paradise said. “There may be differential effects for the two main regions where dilated perivascular spaces were measured, as this effect was not seen in all groups. This might be due to different mechanism of disease in those two areas. But broadly speaking, dilated perivascular spaces are a marker for disease of the microscopic blood vessels of the brain,” he said.

The risk for dementia was seen at four and six years, but not at eight years, Paradise said. “This may be because, by then, a lot of the group developed dementia and the impact from perivascular spaces is masked by other factors, such as the participants’ age.”

An aid to diagnosis?

The researchers noted that their findings could be affected by the fact that the cognitive test data was only available over four years and imaging data might have missed some enlarged perivascular spaces.

Perivascular spaces are also just one marker of small vessel disease, Paradise said. “We are investigating how these perivascular spaces relate to the other neuroimaging markers and hope to construct an index which takes into account the contribution of several markers to produce an estimate of the overall burden from disease of the blood vessels in the brain,” he said.

Rebecca Edelmayer, director of scientific engagement at the Alzheimer’s Association, thinks that perivascular space might become a way of diagnosing dementia, but more research is needed before that could happen.

Most people are currently diagnosed with Alzheimer’s and other dementias through cognitive and functional testing, she said.

“We need to continue to develop biomarker tools and technologies, as well as effective treatment strategies in parallel,” Edelmayer said.

Doctors need a toolbox at their fingertips to help in diagnosis because “accurate and early detection is so critical for people living with dementia and their families,” she said.

“But much more research is needed to truly understand whether looking at perivascular space is going to be a reliable biomarker across diverse populations,” Edelmayer said. “So, I think it’s too early to say that this is something that anyone should ask for in their doctor’s office.”

COVID BITES: CRACKED TEETH ANOTHER CORONAVIRUS SCOURGE

Dentists are drilling down on another worrying trend related to the coronavirus: more cracked teeth.

Like sleepless nights and stomach jitters, teeth grinding is a telltale sign of stress. And the habit -- which can damage and break your choppers -- is sending people to dental offices in growing numbers amid the coronavirus pandemic.

"I have been seeing a lot of broken teeth lately -- way more than I normally see," said Dr. Todd Bertman, a dentist in New York City.

"There is definitely an uptick in cases," agreed Avina Paranjpe, a professor of endodontics at the University of Washington School of Dentistry.

How much of an uptick? "Considering the number of cases we have seen at the university and in practice, I would say about a 30% to 35% increase in cases," Paranjpe said.

Following health guidelines, Bertman and his colleagues closed their facility between March 16 and May 18. "But we did continue to provide tele-dentistry," he said. "We would take emergencies through Zoom. Even at that point I was starting to see many cases of broken teeth. And then when we reopened, there were so many issues related to broken teeth that we really had to prioritize, focusing on handling these sorts of emergencies instead of cleanings."

Bertman and Paranjpe attributed the trend to rising stress levels during the pandemic.

"Stress," said Paranjpe, "is the main reason for the increase in the percentage of cracked teeth." People are dealing with changing job demands, economic fears, unfulfilled social needs or overarching medical concerns.

And COVID-19 stress is likely a widespread problem, with the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention warning that pandemic-induced anxiety "can be overwhelming and cause strong emotions in adults and children."

That emotion can have dental consequences, said Bertman. A lot of his patients who now come in with broken teeth also report headaches and jaw pain, he noted. This suggests a rise in anxiety-driven jaw clenching, teeth grinding, muscle spasms and muscle stress.

Posture may be changing due to COVID concerns, and that can affect dental health, too, Bertman said.

"As we all scramble to find or put together a makeshift work station at home, it's likely that many of us end up in chairs that aren't comfortable and sitting in front of desks that aren't configured for good postural positioning," Bertman said.

The resulting bad posture can lead to pain in your jaw joint and in the muscles that control jaw movement.

Teeth grinding is not uncommon. "And don't assume that you'll know if that's what's happening," warned Paranjpe. Until it's diagnosed, "I would say 50% of patients know they grind their teeth, and the other 50% are unaware."

Paranjpe cited some other factors that may contribute to the rise in tooth fractures, including a reluctance to visit dentists during the pandemic and/or the loss of work-based insurance to cover dental costs.

So what can you do to protect your smile?

Meditation to reduce pervasive stress can be helpful, suggested Bertman. "It brings you into the moment. And that can help you focus more on posture, which is important to be mindful of. Anything you can do -- like stretching or repositioning-- can be helpful."

Night guards are another preventive strategy. "Usually, if we know that a patient is grinding or clenching their teeth, they would be doing this at night, so we recommend a night guard," said Paranjpe.

But Bertman sounded a note of caution: "Don't do orthodontics by yourself."

He noted some people buy mail-order impressions for night guards. If it's not a simple case -- and only a dentist will know that -- they may have a problem. "The wrong fit can rearrange the bite, or cause discomfort, pain and loose teeth, so don't diagnose yourself," he said.

High Blood Pressure While Pregnant Linked to Poorer Memory Years Later

High blood pressure and pre-eclampsia during pregnancy may follow women through the years, causing lower scores on tests of memory and thinking skills, a Dutch study suggests.

The study of nearly 600 pregnant women included 481 with normal blood pressure and 115 who developed high blood pressure during their pregnancies.

Of those 115 women, 70% had gestational hypertension, which is high blood pressure that starts after 20 weeks of pregnancy in women who previously had normal readings. The other 30% had pre-eclampsia, a pregnancy complication marked by high blood pressure and elevated protein levels in the urine that develop after 20 weeks of pregnancy.

“Women with high blood pressure that starts in pregnancy, as well as women with pre-eclampsia, should be monitored closely after their pregnancy, and they and their physicians should consider lifestyle changes and other treatments that may help reduce their risk of decline in their thinking and memory skills later in life,” said study author Dr. Maria Adank. She is with the department of obstetrics and gynecology at Erasmus University Medical Center in Rotterdam, the Netherlands.

Adank’s team tested the study participants after 15 years, asking them to recall a list of 15 words, first right away and then again after 20 minutes.

On the immediate recall test, which was given three times, women who had no high blood pressure problems 15 years earlier scored an average 28 points out of a possible 45. The women who had high blood pressure during pregnancy posted an average score of 25.

After adjusting for other factors that could affect thinking skills, such as a woman’s weight before pregnancy, her education and ethnicity, the researchers found that women who had high blood pressure during pregnancy performed worse on the immediate and delayed recall task.

The investigators found no differences between the two groups on tests of fine motor skills, verbal fluency, processing speed and visual-spatial ability.

The women were not given memory or thinking tests before or during their pregnancies, the authors noted in the report published online Dec. 30 in the journal Neurology.

Adank said the study does not show a cause-and-effect relationship between high blood pressure and test scores, only an association.

“It’s important to consider gestational hypertension and pre-eclampsia as risk factors for cognitive impairment that are specific to women,” Adank said in a news release from the American Academy of Neurology. “Many women may think of this as a temporary issue during pregnancy and not realize that it could potentially have long-lasting effects.”

More study is needed to learn whether early treatment can prevent thinking and memory problems in women with a history of high blood pressure in pregnancy, she added.

Pain Management / El Manejo del Dolor

Pain management is the discipline concerned with the relief of pain. Acute pain, such as occurs with trauma, often has a reversible cause & may require only transient measures & correction of the underlying problem. In contrast, chronic pain often results from conditions that are difficult to diagnose or impossible to reverse.

Pharmacy Chains Ready to Supply COVID-19 Vaccines to Americans

Now that federal guidelines have expanded COVID-19 vaccine eligibility to include people over 65 and those of all ages with underlying health conditions, drug stores say they are ready, willing and able to start giving the shots.

There’s just one slight glitch: supply. But with two vaccines already available and others moving toward emergency use authorization, experts say supply will likely soon catch up with demand.

As of Jan. 14, the Federal Retail Pharmacy Partnership Program has tapped two pharmacy chains per state to offer free COVID-19 vaccines. Pharmacies will be notified if they can take part in this initial rollout.

Spearheaded by Operation Warp Speed, the government’s vaccine development program, this plan will ultimately allow more than 40,000 pharmacies across the nation to inject 100 million vaccines in a month’s time. Already signed on as partners are CVS, Walgreens, Duane Reade, Costco, Walmart, Rite Aid, Publix and more.

Fully 250 million people in the United States are now eligible for COVID-19 vaccines, and pharmacies can help speed the slower-than-expected vaccine distribution process, said Kathleen Jaeger, senior vice president of pharmacy care and patient advocacy at the National Association of Chain Drug Stores (NACDS), an Alexandria, Virginia-based trade group representing chain pharmacies.

“With 40,000 drug stores and one vaccinator per store, it would be very easy to deliver 100 million vaccine doses in one month,” said Jaeger during an NACDS news briefing on Wednesday.

“Many people live within five miles of a local pharmacy, so it will be easier to give out the vaccines,” she said. “We stand ready, and our capacity is tremendous.”

Exactly how pharmacies will dole out COVID-19 vaccines is not fully understood yet. They may use an appointment system to avoid long lines and crowding, she said. The government asked 19 pharmacy partners to help develop a more precise game plan.

There has been some concern about allergic reactions to COVID-19 vaccines, and pharmacists can handle this as they have experience in giving flu and H1N1 shots, she said. “We always observe a patient for 15 minutes after a vaccine,” she noted. If a person has a history of life-threatening allergic reactions, they should get their vaccines under strict medical supervision, she added.

“Pharmacists can also dispel misinformation about the COVID-19 vaccine,” she said.

The new pharmacy initiative is on top of other federal programs that allow pharmacists to dole out vaccines, including the Pharmacy Partnership for Long-Term Care Program. As part of this program, Walgreens and CVS and Managed Health Care Associates, Inc., offer on-site COVID-19 shots to residents of nursing homes and assisted-living facilities. And a federal “transfer program” makes it possible for unused vaccines to be transferred from hospitals to pharmacies to arms, Jaeger explained.

“These vaccines are just sitting on shelves in freezers and refrigerators and need to be moved,” she said. “Transfer to community pharmacies that stand ready makes a lot of sense.”

More than 29 million vaccine doses have been distributed so far in the United States, and over 10 million people have received their first dose.

Hospitals will be releasing more doses now that they are confident that second doses will be available. The two vaccines currently in use require two doses. “National guidelines are needed as we move forward to make sure that no dose goes unused,” Jaeger added.

Now That Psychiatric Care Has Gone Online, Many Patients Want It to Stay There

Only a year ago, Michigan Medicine psychiatrists were trying to recruit patients to give telepsychiatry a try, with very little success.

The psychiatrists worked with people by video only 26 times in six months, while 30,000 visits happened in person. But that changed quickly when the coronavirus pandemic forced closures in the area in late March.

Now, not only have patients seeking help with mental health issues been working through their emotions and experiences by video and phone for months -- many would like to keep those options, a new study shows.

"Telepsychiatry is an interesting tool for various reasons in terms of providing early access to care, connecting patients in rural areas or who live far away from clinics to be able to get good evidence-based care," said study author Dr. Jennifer Severe, a psychiatrist who helped launch a test of telehealth initiatives at the University of Michigan's outpatient psychiatry clinic.

"Even patients who are closer, based on life burden and expectation, they might not be able to keep up with their appointments, so telehealth actually offers a way to remain connected with care, regardless of how busy people's lives might be," Severe said.

For the study, published recently in the journal JMIR Formative Research, researchers surveyed 244 patients or parents of minor patients in summer 2020. The patients had mental health appointments in the first weeks of the pandemic shutdown.

Most of the survey participants had their own or their child's first pandemic-time appointment through a video call. A minority of patients, 13.5%, started telepsychiatry with phone visits. That group was more likely to be older than 45.

Nearly all of the study participants who had a telepsychiatry visit said it went as well as expected or better.

About half (46.7%) said they were likely to continue with telepsychiatry even after in-person visits were available again. Those who had appointments by phone instead of video were much less likely to want to continue remote mental health care in the future.

"The excitement is there, but we need to make sure that we have a way to keep up with the demand," Severe said.

This data could help inform the decisions of health insurers and government agencies who will make decisions about whether and how to pay mental health care providers for future virtual care, Severe said.

To improve access, while the survey was ongoing, senior study author Dr. Mary Carol Blazek led development of a program called Geriatric Education for Telehealth Access, or GET Access, to help older patients.

The study didn't cover the issue of no-shows and appointment cancellations, but those have been reduced substantially, according to Michigan Medicine.

Phone and video visits within established patient-mental health provider relationships are equally effective, Severe said.

However, for first visits, the therapists typically try to avoid using the phone because it can reduce communication cues and limits observing facial expressions, interaction and movement, which can help evaluate mental health status. Sometimes physical exams can be required to assess a patient's balance and mobility, as well as check for medication side effects.

"Sometimes communication might be difficult. Sometimes you might need to do a physical exam. There might be a lack of important physical exam approaches and communication techniques that might be missing," Severe said. "So, that's one reason I will say telehealth might not be for everyone."

Severe hopes to see more of a blended approach after the pandemic, where a patient may do a face-to-face visit, followed by a couple of telehealth visits, and then return for another face-to-face visit.

During the pandemic, telehealth has been responsible for saving small mental health practices while also continuing to help patients, said Vaile Wright, senior director of health care innovation for the American Psychological Association.

"The evidence is pretty strong. People are having mental health difficulties, much more so than in the past and, thankfully, they are seeking out treatment," Wright added. "I think telehealth makes it possible for them to do so safely."

For some people, it may be harder to connect in a virtual environment. For others, it may make it easier because they don't have to get time off work, figure out child care or travel to the office.

Issues to consider are ensuring that patients understand the online platform, have adequate internet accessibility and have adequate privacy in their homes to have a mental health appointment. Backup safety plans also need to be considered, Wright said.

"What happens if somebody is in a crisis? When they're in your office [you] have a system in place, but when they're not, maybe [you're] not even sure where they're located exactly, that can make it challenging," Wright said. "So, ensuring that you've got those sorts of backups in place is important."

IMPROVING ACCESS TO AFTER-HOURS PRIMARY CARE CUTS ED VISITS

Incentivizing physicians to improve access to after-hours care reduces some less-urgent visits to emergency department a woman on the phone at the table Incentivizing primary care physicians to provide services after hours is associated with a reduction in less urgent visits to the emergency department, according to a study published online Jan. 18 in CMAJ, the journal of the Canadian Medical Association.

Michael Hong, from Western University in London, Ontario, Canada, and colleagues analyzed a retrospective cohort of a random sample of Ontario residents from April 2002 to March 2006 (586,534 patients) and a subcohort of 201,594 patients followed from April 2005 to March 2016. Patient and primary care physician data were linked to emergency department visit data.

The researchers found that introduction of the after-hours premium was associated with a reduction of 1.26 less urgent visits to the emergency department per 1,000 patients per month after controlling for patient and physician characteristics, seasonality, and time-invariant patient confounding factors. Most of this decrease was in after-hours visits compared with visits during regular hours. The monthly reduction in less urgent visits to the emergency department was in the range of -1.24 to -1.16 per 1,000 patients in sensitivity analyses. There was an association noted between subsequent increases in the after-hours premium and a small reduction in less urgent visits to the emergency department.

“Interventions to reduce potentially avoidable emergency department visits are of considerable interest to policy-makers; the use of incentives to promote access to after-hours primary care and divert patients away from the emergency department in a cost-effective manner is one policy option to consider,” the authors write.
